Critical Thinking Worksite: Argument Identification

The first stage in critical thinking is argument identification. Given that some of what people say and do is not argumentative, one must be able to distinguish the arguments from other types of expression. The situation here is no different than in, say, an English Comp question where you are asked to find the split infinitives in a chunk of text. It will be difficult to do well on this

With the notion of argument in play, I then argue that critical thinking can be approached as argumentation without loss of anything essential to the subject. If we teach our students to construct and analyze arguments, broadly conceived, we teach our students to think critically. No central critical thinking skill need be left out of an instructional approach that emphasizes argument. I
